Cyber-bullying takes toll on teens' mental health

By Niall Murray, Education Correspondent

Four of every five teenagers seen by the country's biggest independent mental health service have been recent victims of cyber-bullying.

Although their underlying issues mostly relate to issues like eating disorders, anxiety disorder, substance abuse and, in rare cases, psychotic disorder, 80% of those referred to the adolescent services of St Patrick's University Hospital (SPUH) were bullied online in the weeks or months before being referred there.

SPUH medical director Prof Jim Lucey said this kind of harassment could worsen the effect of existing mental health problems for many young people.

"The trouble is that there is no escape from cyber-bullying like there is from bullying in the school yard. The impact of things being online means there is no going back, the genie is out of the bottle," he said.

"The magnetisation of exposure is huge because if five so-called friends are saying something bad on Facebook, they will have another 500 friends and it enlarges very quickly."
